The complexity for factorization in general is O(n^2) of course, but when the input is a large number the factoring of each number can be computed in O(log N) so the total complexity is O(n*(log N)). My question is whether the same applies for computing prime factors of a large number. Example: factoring a 1e8 number (8 decimal digits) takes a few seconds, but factoring the prime factors of the number only takes fraction of a second. Why is this so? A: How big is a few seconds here? For a 1Gb, a couple seconds will never be enough for the current state of the art. If you already know the answer, this is not much of a question: the Gaussian prime factorization algorithm is a prob
