T. Costello Abstract Homemade cellulose is one of the oldest known and most widely used biopolymers on the planet. It is found in abundance around the world in the bodies of plants in the form of plant fibers, as small particles, as pre-fibrillated cellulose, and in the form of anionic polyelectrolyte solutions. The small particles and fibers are held together by hydrogen bonds between cellulose hydroxyl groups and negative charges on the surface of the fibers. In the pre-fibrillated state, these hydrogen bonds are fixed, and the microfibrils are held together by Van der Waals forces. The world wide range of compositions and structures that exist between and within plant fibers is due to the homogeneity and abundance of hydrogen bonding. The hydrogen bonds are of two types: bond strengths that are, on average, larger than 90% of the average thermal dissociation enthalpy and weaker Van der Waals interactions. Commercial corn and other grain sources for industrial cellulose production are very heterogeneous, and this heterogeneity has a deleterious effect on the mechanical properties of fibers and particles. During the wet-chemical preparation of these commercial sources, their surfaces are altered to remove the amorphous regions of the fibers, as well as other components that are either energetically unfavorable or present deleterious effects on the properties of the resulting fibers. The homogeneous nature of plant cellulose is crucial to its widespread use, and as noted in this thesis, it also makes it useful for a variety of applications.
